Honey Lover Gets Stuck

PERHAPS you've heard about a roly poly bear with the yum-yum name of Honey-lover bear. He was called that because he loved to eat honey more than anything else, even lollipops and chocolate ice cream. Also, Honey-lover was a very pleasant bear.

Now Rusty rabbit was only a sometimes-pleasant rabbit and that was when he wasn't in his teasing mood. "I guess I'll have to think of something to stir up Honey-lover," he mused one day, as he pecked around a hollow log to watch Honey-lover stretching in the spring sunlight.

"Hiya, honey head," chortled Rusty. "Raided any beehives lately?" Honey-lover just yawned. He was used to Rusty's teasing. "Now Rusty, you know I just woke up from hibernating. I haven't had time to buy honey from the bees yet." Then as he reached his arms up in the air in a wondering relaxing stretch, he continued, "Besides, I'm so glad to be out of my cave after that long winter, I just want to stay outside and soak up this fine sunshine. Ho hum."

Rusty shrugged, "Well, relax, chum. Don't let me interrupt your awakening. Ta ta." And he hopped away. He was in his very special teasing mood. The first thing he did was to borrow all the honey the bees would lend him. Then he tugged, and hauled, and dragged the heavy honey pots back towards the cave. When he got there, Honey-lover was gone, so he set aside the heavy honey pots and started to pile stones and dirt around the entrance to Honey-lover's cave.

When Honey-lover returned a few hours later, there was Rusty rabbit, lounging sleepily outside the cave entrance. "I brought you a present, pal," said Rusty. "Inside the cave there's a heap of honey." My goodness, you should have seen how excited Honey-lover was. "That's very kind of you, Rusty," he said happily. "Won't you join me in a snack?" "Sure thing," replied Rusty and with a hop and a skip he was inside the cave. Honey-lover crawled into the cave after him. He didn't notice how narrow the entrance had become because he was such a thin bear after hibernating all winter. So the bear and the rabbit started gulping down that wonderful, golden honey. They ate and ate and ate, until they were simply stuffed.

Finally, after a long time of eating, Rusty stood up. "Well, Honey-lover, I'm glad you enjoyed my surprise and I think you're in for another. How about a romp through the forest?" And with that, he hopped out of the cave. Honey-lover stuck his nose out, then his head and his front paws. Then he wiggled a little and got his shoulders through the opening. Then, "Oof!" he groaned because with one big shove, his plump tummy full of honey, was stuck jam tight in that opening and Honey-lover could move neither forward nor backward. All during this time, Rusty rabbit was rolling on the ground laughing as hard as he could. In fact, he was laughing so much he didn't see Wily fox come creeping up behind him until the struggling Honey-lover looked up and called out to him.

With that Rusty hopped to his feet and started to dash around in mad circles. Of course he could not move as quickly as he usually did because his tummy was full of honey, too. Now Wily fox felt perfectly safe in waiting for Rusty to get tired because he really enjoyed a meal of rabbit and he knew that Honey-lover couldn't do him any harm as long as he was stuck in the cave entrance.

Things looked pretty dreadful for Rusty as he hopped around getting more and more tired and Wily fox just circled after him and looked very hungry. Finally Rusty ran up to Honey-lover. "You have to get out of there and save me," he panted. "But . . ." said the bear and he tried to struggle free once more. "I can't, Rusty." With a whoosh, Rusty darted away, his foot tossing a bit of dust into Honey-lover's face. And just as Wily fox was about to pounce on Rusty, Honey-lover gave the biggest, loudest sneeze you can imagine and "PWOW!" he zoomed out of that cave entrance.

Well, this so startled Wily that he dashed away into the forest and Rusty fell, exhausted at the feet of the bewildered Honey-lover. "I'll never forget this, Honey-lover," he exclaimed gratefully, "I'll never tease you again. Believe me." But Honey-lover didn't quite believe him because everybody knew that Rusty rabbit was the biggest tease in the forest!
